It is a matter of satisfaction that Ayurveda during the past few decades has won international recognition as an effective system of medicine and health care. The world today has great expectations from this ancient system. Inquisitive scholars from far and near are now engaged in research studies on various aspects of Ayurvedic teaching and healing. The responsibility of physicians, now, is more than it was in earlier days.

The Founder of Arya Vaidya Sala had realised a century ago that dissemination of ancient knowledge is the pre-requisite for rejuvenating the system. Hence when he founded this pioneer institution in 1902, he made arrangements for popularisation of ancient knowledge by starting the first ever journal in Ayurveda – Dhanvantari. The role of it in the renaissance of Ayurveda in the first half of the last century is part of history. Dhanvantari was in Malayalam language. When the scope of ayurvedic studies was extended to foreign countries, we started in 1987 a quarterly journal in English – Aryavaidyan. It has successfully completed 36 years with 143 issues.

It is our hope that the Aryavaidyan will be found useful as a contemporary reference journal as well as an effective communication
